From consumers to specialists: agricommodity market information for everyone. by Samuel Arthur

Article published on January 18th 2012 | Business

As consumers, we are often aware when there are price changes in the products we buy. Invariably, these changes are the results of changes in the base commodities market, and for those people involved in this industry, information is key. This website provides an extensive and constantly updating depiction of the market.

From soft commodities such as grain and cocoa, to farmland prices, this website prides itself on offering headline news, the latest research information, and market prices to individuals who either work in the agricommodities sector directly, or who are involved with it through another capacity, or even consumers with an interest in the sector. Through the wealth of information that it offers, any person can benefit from the insights proffered through this website.

However, not to simply swamp everyone with information that they may not necessarily need, this website offers a levelled membership scheme, ranging from the standard web user, who does not even need to register, and who is allowed access to the more general sections of the site, to a registered reader, who pays nothing to register and gets access to a general overview of all areas, while a paid up member, can access the latest weather reports, most up to date information, specialist reports, and financial data.

Where this could be seen as limiting access of certain people, the advantage is that the correct information is delivered to those people that want it. A standard consumer may not be immediately concerned with a full list of commodity price charts, but would find the general, more world-wide headlines interesting. By comparison, a commodity specific breakdown of the futures markets or farmland prices would be relevance to an industry specialist, who would no doubt be willing to pay for this level of detail and specialist knowledge.

All sections of this website are maintained either weekly, such as the research pages of the website offering specific commodity price charts and information on market trends, or daily, such as the news section, as can be seen from how new relevant stories are uploaded each day, and thus supplies both the industry and consumers with up to date information.

Across the site there are a range of topics dealt with extending from the specifically industry relevant to the more wide ranging. Specific topics covered have included the best-selling commodities in the markets, market behaviour, any specific breaking news relevant to a particular area be it soft commodities or any other of the agricommodities such as new government regulations. By contrast the more general, world-wide breaking news includes headlines such as the financial state of the EU, and dubious future of the Euro.

In this way, by restricting access to certain areas of the site, and tailoring the information displayed on the pages to a particular audience, this website is able to offer relevant information to any of their users, without having sacrifice on detail when it comes to more specialist information.
