Personal attention for every child is a must at a nursery by Juliette Winser

Article published on December 27th 2011 | K-12 Education

Children come to a nursery with the intention of having fun and meeting more kids their age; building bonds with friends and educators alike. Education imparted at most nurseries in Dubai is done so with the help of play; play which secretly involves learning, making it fun to learn. Children are often kept in groups at a nursery and taught together but always need the love, attention and affection that they can absorb from others around them.

Teachers and educators must also be around when children play and pay attention to every detail; keeping in mind a childâ€™s growth both physical and mental. This helps an educator work on a childâ€™ growth helping them view, analyse and act in case a child is falling back or is in need of special attention. Children often get distracted and take off on a different path which is why teachers need to be aware of this and guide them back so that they do not get stranded in the later stages of their lives.

Personal attention in the form of an assessment will also help a teacher give a better feedback when they meet a childâ€™s parents. This assessment in turn gives parents a better idea and may point out flaws that parents themselves may have not noticed when the child is at home. Hence giving personal attention to a child benefits the child, the educator and the parents keeping all involved.

The Kensington British Nursery in Dubai understands that each child is an individual and with this in mind they conduct a personal development assessment for each child when they join the nursery in order to structure their activities appropriately. Throughout their stay, the child is continually monitored and their achievements, recognised against a set of early learning goals. For pre-school stage students, The Kensington allows parent/teacher conferences and for all students biâ€“annual written reports. Parents are encouraged to seek advice and discuss any concerns they may have with regards to their childâ€™s development, with their class teacher.
