Organizations have to deal with paperwork all the time. While public information is easy to manage, private data is more sensitive in nature. Extra measures must be taken to protect private data from getting leaked. Otherwise, crimes like identity theft and leakages can devastate an individual or company.

Protecting sensitive information doesnâ€™t end when a company is done with a document. This means even an expired affidavit or contract canâ€™t be disposed by just dumping it in a trash bin. Anybody can retrieve the document from the bin and use it to gain valuable information, which can be used against an individual or company. This means itâ€™s important to make sure that any confidential documents must be destroyed beyond recognition when disposing them.

Properly disposing sensitive information has become a major priority that two legislations were enacted to support the practice: the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003 (FACTA) and the Fair Credit Reporting Act. The latter emphasizes the accuracy and privacy of the information contained in consumer reports, while the latter expands the provisions of the Fair Credit Reporting Act to protect identity theft victims. The FACTA has a Disposal Rule which encourages reasonable disposal practices for the protection of confidential information.

Although there are many ways to permanently destroy sensitive paperwork, shredding them is the most widely used method. Any company can buy paper shredders and have their employees spend time disposing confidential documents, but businesses that require high-volume shredding rely on outsourced paper shredding services Los Angeles third-party companies offer to cut down costs and make sure the documents are disposed properly.
