How the Virginia Housing Market Will Fare in 2012 by Clorinda Altavilla

Article published on February 6th 2012 | Real Estate

In the current local and global economic climate, businesses from different industries and sectors may find it difficult to keep afloat or be competitive. The recent mortgage crisis in the US affected thousands of homeowners and real estate companies in most states. In Virginia, home prices went rock bottom, resulting to the real estate collapse. This undeniably affected mortgage rates and buying trends.

According to finance experts, the Virginia housing market may still be unsecured despite its being on the mend. Home sales in Alexandria for example fell towards the end of 2011, giving another challenge to stakeholders as home prices went lower further. On a lighter note, sales in the region should recover on the forecast deflation of 4 percent in 2012. This potential boost comes from an increase in home sales as many workers from Washington, DC buy homes in the area.

Other homeowners in Virginia concerned over rising foreclosures in their community also worry about unsecured mortgage holders. Arlington homeowners have seen housing prices level-off in the last quarter due to the surge in home sales. A projected increase in bank-assisted sales and foreclosures, however, might pressure home prices and cause them to decline by 3 percent next year. Richmond homeowners also try to recover as home sale prices rise and fall due to the mortgage crisis. Tax payer money spent in the region may project a rise in sales at 4 percent.

According to real estate experts, prices houses for sale in leesburg va may also be affected by location. This market niche covers both physical and price range factors. Houses within walking distance of shops, parks, cafes, and different modes of transportation are more in demand than others in relatively inaccessible neighborhoods. Families with children prefer homes near schools for their children's safety and convenience. Proximity to a major metropolitan area can also positively impact home prices.

Aside from location, supply and demand also affect prices and value of Ashburn VA homes. A surplus of unsold properties gives home buyers more choices and minimizes such homes' appeal. As most veteran real estate agents and brokers say, more people will go for properties when there are only few units available for sale. Properties in sought-after neighborhoods often sell more despite possible high prices.

In 2012, interest rates will still affect the Ashburn VA homes companies sell. As interest rates fall, the cost to get a mortgage for home purchasing decreases, which in turn creates a higher demand and pushes prices up. Consult trusted real estate experts in your area to know how you can get a good deal in 2012.
