It is a hard and sometimes impossible task to get a regular loan from banks or credit unions to buy a new or used automobile when you have a poor credit score. Even if a lender does offer you a loan, the interest rates charged may be so high that you may not be able to meet the expense of the loan. In these circumstances, auto loans for bad credit prove very helpful.

There is a higher risk for the lender offering auto loans for bad credit than a traditional lender as the borrower has a poor credit history, previously having failed to fulfill some financial commitments. Buying a used car instead of a brand new one allows you to fund the purchase with a smaller loan that also puts a much smaller monthly burden on your finances.

People who are looking to buy a new car but have a poor credit score that prevents them from getting a regular loan can benefit greatly from opting for pre-approved auto financing for bad credit. This makes the loan shopping and car purchase process much easier.

Pre-approval is based on various factors. Your current income and credit history are two of the most important factors that are considered. Other than these, your lender may also ask for an estimate of your total disposable income as this will disclose your repayment capacity. Every lender calculates the total pre-approval amount for a potential borrower using his own special formula that takes all these factors into account.
