Features to Look for in Natural Swim Suits for Kids by Mathew Witzke

Narrowly defined, natural swimwear for kids can be considered as garments that are comfortable and easy to wear. Another definition of natural swimwear is that it is made of natural or organic fibers. The fiber might be organically grown cotton, as an example. These garments are perfect for children's swimming pool, beach or wading pool attire. Synthetic fibers that are comfortable to wear can also be considered natural.

When you are shopping for children's swimwear, some features are necessities. Others are just desirable as features. The styles, colors or designs can fall into this category. The garments selected should always be carefully matched to your child's age and gender. Here are other important features to check.

Always be sure to check the label of the garments you are considering for your baby, boys or girls. Look for the UPF rating on the garment. The UPF rating tells you whether the garment is designed to protect against the burning rays of the sun. Ultraviolet rays on your toddler's skin can quickly suffer sunburn is there is not adequate protection with the fabric and sunscreen applied.

Studies show that a sunburn as a child can nearly double the risk of contracting skin cancer later in life. Check on the label to determine what the ultraviolet protection (UPF) factor is. If no information about UPF protection is listed on the label, the garment probably only has minimal or no protection against UV rays. The highest level of protection is a 50+.

Cotton fibers are typically recognized to be environmentally friendly. However, they might not be the best fabric to cover your girls and babies as swimwear. Instead, consider a lycra and nylon blend. This type of fabric will wick the water away from your child's body so that she isn't plagued with chills and chattering teeth. In addition, the fabric should have strong UV protection. Boys swim wear should also have built-in UPF rating. For babies and children, a hat will keep the skin of the face and head from burns, especially if you are sure to apply sunscreen.

If you are working with a budget, the price of the garments you choose is something else to check. Using the World Wide Web is often less expensive to find the right choice for the children in your family. The selection is wider. Look at two or three web pages to compare prices so that you find the best buy. Don't be tempted to economize by buying a larger size that your child needs. It can cause problems with movement. By the same token, don't use a too-small garment that will chafe and rub delicate skin.

Look for bright and attractive colors that are color fast. When children are playing in chlorinated water such as a pool, the clothing can deteriorate quickly if the garments are not rinsed in clear water after each use. A swimming suit that will stand up to sun, sand, chlorine and general wear and tear is a bargain at any price.

Finding natural swimwear for kids is easy to do when there are certain things to look for. Choose a fabric that has built-in ultraviolet protection factor. The garments, including a hat should cover children's tender skin. Apply sunblock religiously to protect against burns.
