If you will be visiting Derbyshire very soon, then you should already make arrangements for your accommodations. Call some hotels in Derbyshire to find out about their rates. It also helps to know more about this county before you get there. A little know-how regarding the cityâ€™s history will go a long way once you start site-seeing.

Derbyshire is a county in the East Midlands of the UK. The Peak District National Park lies within Derbyshire. Part of the Pennines Mountain Range also lies in the northern side of the county. A portion of the National Forest is also included in this area. The county is bordered by Greater Manchester, West Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, South Yorkshire, Leicestershire, Cheshire, and Staffordshire.

Derby, which is part of Derbyshire, is in unitary authority. The country contains 30 towns, each of which are inhabited by 10,000 to 100,000 people. Majority of the residents live in only 25 percent of the area since most of the land is agricultural.

The county was first inhabited by people 200,000 years ago during the interglacial period. Later on, in the Neolithic and Upper Palaeolithic period, more people visited the area. Most of the visitors were nomadic hunters. Many of the roaming tribes resided in limestone caves near the Nottinghamshire border.

Ask a tourist guide or the concierge at hotels in Derbyshire about visiting the burial grounds scattered around central Derbyshire. There are interesting tombs to visit in Five Wells and Minning Low. Visit the famous Henge Monuments of Arbor Low. The Henge Monument dates back to 2500 BCE.

By the Bronze Age, settlers begin to plant agricultural crops especially in the Peak District where signs of clearance and old huts are still evident. The Romans invaded Derbyshire because they were attracted to lead ore in the limestone hills. Some of the Romans settled in Brough, Hope Valley, and Glossop then later settled in Buxton for the warm springs.

Today, Derbyshire is a combination of a rural economy, coal mining and farming. Limestone, lead, coal and iron are typically mined in the area. Steel making also became a main source of income for the county. Eventually cement manufacturing also became a major industry in the 20th century.

Today, Derbyshireâ€™s major industries include Nestle Waters UK, Thorntons, JCB Power Systems, Toyota, and Rolls Royce. There are many interesting places to visit in this county aside from the old part of town. There are numerous art galleries, parks, museums, limestone caves, castles and old gardens.

There are aquariums and bird conservatories in this county. Derbyshire can offer something for the young and old. Restaurants and bars dot the entire city. Entertainment, concerts and ballet shows are also common pastimes in the area. You can visit antiques shops that sell old pine furniture.

For more adventurous travellers, there is the Alton Towers and Gulliverâ€™s Kingdom. Nature lovers will enjoy Ilam Park and the Derbyshire Dales National Nature Reserve. You have a lot of choices when it comes to hotels in Derbyshire. Most accommodations are near the best tourist destinations in the county.
