â€œI felt like scratching Andrewâ€™s face when he gave me that scornful look. I dislike him so much that every time I see his face, I feel like killing himâ€•. This is a state of mind people have when they get annoyed. Anger has been compared with devil because people get angry; they intend to forget the difference between good and bad and happen to commit crime. These days we can find a number of children with a short temper attitude. However, before going into a conclusion we should go for a research to find out why children get angry.

There are many things that can make kids annoyed, in the same way as they do with adults, but parents over and over again find handling angry kids to be the hardest part the parenting job. They feel the whole thing from tiredness to nerve wracking annoyance. Many of us were told when we were kids that we were not â€œpermittedâ€• to be annoyed, and that annoyance with parents or guardians reflects great lack of respect and egoism. These types of childhood viewpoints make it much hard for us to deal with annoyance in kids.

To take steps to make the children overcome the attitude of anger, parents should open their lines of communication with their kids. Parents should teach kids that annoyance is normal, and it is good enough and normal to get annoyed. The task at that time then becomes how to handle anger and control it toward fruitful or at least tolerable outlets, and not how to refuse or suppress it. Setbacks and obstructions can make us sturdy if they face us to grow.

Parents and teachers must keep in mind that just there are many things which make the kids angry; therefore they should be careful while dealing with them. Becoming angry is quite very normal for any human being. Parents many times suppress the anger of the kids, but it is also been seen many times that kids respond back with annoyance because they feel unable to help. To help the kids to overcome their problem parents should never scold them for everything they do. Rather they should the reason of that anger and try to solve it.
