Gold panning is one of the simpler processes of extracting gold from ores. It is so called because all you do really is mix gold and gravel mixture in a pan and then stir it in water. This separates out different layers based on their specific gravity with gold and the heavier sediments settling down and a lot of dust and lighter material coming out. It is one of the easiest processes as far as gold mining is concerned and has been in use from times immemorial. There are some basic types of equipment that you will need for gold panning, although there is nothing extraordinary about it.

As far as gold panning supplies are concerned, you will need small bottle to store the gold you collect. Vials or smaller containers are used. You will need a bigger bucket, where you will actually collect the initial material from which you will have to separate out the gold. Apart from the utility bucket, you will also need shovel, trowel and other such gold panning equipment to collect the material that you are going to need. Screens might come out to be useful.

Sometimes people use crowbars to crack open the cracks underneath which they can actually find virgin gold. However, the most important gold panning equipment of them all is the pan itself which is usually around 10 â€“ 17 inches in diameter. This pan is usually made of metal although high impact plastic is also being used to make it off late. It is important to pick materials which do not rust and at the same time are corrosion resistant too. You will also want to pay attention to the color of the pans as black sediments get deposited at the bottom along with the gold and you will need a color that can highlight the sediments.
