Black History Month is a time to celebrate those leaders who have inspired a race to overcome all obstacles. Black history is something that brings tears to the eyes of many people even today. Their struggle for freedom and recognition in the postcolonial era is something that still inspires millions of people all over the world. Racial prejudice is something that they cannot help. And although a lot of measures have been taken to make people aware of racism and its harm, there are still those who do not understand.

Today in black history, a lot of things have to be taught to the children of their community as they fail to understand that the reason they are now acclimatized to the mainstream American society is because of the sacrifices of their ancestors. The African Americans were brought into America from their native African land by the cotton planters. Black soil was found in abundance in the newly found land of America and yet a vast amount of manual labor was required to clean the pods and make the make the cotton balls fit for spinning.

Over time, due to the consideration of President Lincoln, the northern states broke free of the southern states, the Civil War broke out and after much struggle, African Americans found their present freedom. Memoirs and literary works have been filled with accounts of these struggles. Today, the President of America is famous African American. It is one of those instances that will go down in history. Today, African Americans have made their own place in the world and can live with their head held high.
