Different Types of Travel Insurance for Different Travellers by Sebastian Jerrems

Article published on February 16th 2012 | Insurance

When most people think of arranging cover for an upcoming holiday, they often get no further than asking their travel agent to deal with it for them. Whilst this might sound like an attractive option, as it obviates the need to think about the subject for any length of time, it can work out to be considerably more expensive than purchasing a policy direct from an insurer.

Whether you need one way travel insurance to cover a trip home from a country where you have been enjoying an extended break or are looking for a policy that will cover you for the duration of such an adventure, it should be possible to purchase what you need from an insurer that specialises in selling their products over the Internet. Although there are quite a few different policies available, the basic difference between most of them is the amount of cover that they offer for various things such as medical expenses and lost or delayed luggage.

Older couples may prefer the type of comprehensive travel insurance that many firms offer as they are often more interested in making sure that nothing spoils their trip rather than in trying to save a little on the cost of their cover. However, if you are young, free, and single and determined to have a good time for the least amount of money possible, there are a variety of options that may appeal to you, such as the backpacker policies that can be purchased online.

Whether you are planning an extended trip to the other side of the world or organising a weekend break in a nearby country, the travel insurance London based firms and those in other major cities have to offer should include a policy that fits your needs. The fact that there are so many insurers trying to attract the same type of customers means that it is usually possible to get a good deal , whatever type of cover you wish to purchase.

People that are planning to participate in dangerous activities such as base jumping, hang gliding or freefall parachuting during their trip should check whether their policy covers them for these types of activities before leaving for their holiday.
