Article published on December 19th 2011 | Clothing

Peruvian knitwear and clothing are popular items both in their country of origin and around the modern world. Most of the knitted pieces are made from the fibers of alpacas which are prevalent in the Andes Mountains of South America, particularly in Peru. There are a wide array of items available including scarves, sweaters, mittens, vests and other knit pieces.

Alpaca fibers are very similar to sheep's wool in that it keeps the wearer warm. But Alpaca wool is quite often preferred, particularly by those who have allergies. This is because alpaca does not have lanolin in it, which helps to make it hypoallergenic. This is one thing that makes it desirable by people who want to have warmth like that of wool but who have skin allergies.

Furthermore, alpaca fibers don't have the same poky fibers that are present in wool that comes from sheep. That wool is known to be irritating to the wearer's skin and can even cause an itchy rash. Alternately, alpaca fibers are very soft and comfortable to wear.

The supple fibers are sometimes called "El Oro de los Andes" in Peru, which means, "The Gold of the Andes". It really is an important part of the country's rich history, as well as being an important element in the country's modern economy. The revenue made from making and selling these items does a lot to help support many people of the region.

The pieces that are created there are famous for their longevity. Alpaca fibers do not pill and keep a beautiful appearance, even after repeated use. The patterns and designs on the clothes are timeless and have a classic look too, and will provide the buyer with many years of wear without the worry of looking out of date.

Some of the designs stray from their traditional patters, and have a modern silhouette. Staying in tune with modern fashion trends, helps to make these articles even more desirable and attractive to a larger audience. They are often made in fibers in the trendiest colors and can be purchased at expensive retail stores around the world.

The art of making beautiful clothes from alpaca fibers is passed down from one generation to the next. Artists from this region have been making pieces from alpaca for many years, as it was important to their survival. Even today, this is a skill that families pass on to younger family members, as the artisans continue to make a living by creating these high quality pieces to sell, not only in Peru, but to export to retailers around the globe.

Peruvian knitwear and clothing is a wise investment because it is long lasting, comfortable to wear and is available in a wide variety of beautiful designs and colors. Creating these pieces is a skill that is passed down from one generation to the next and is a very important factor in the history of Peru. In addition, the industry is crucial to modern day Peru, because these pieces are sought after throughout the globe.
