Vancouver Students Undecided on a Major? Choose Fashion Marketing by William Hauselberg

Article published on January 6th 2012 | Education

Vancouver students that are undecided about their major should take their time and try to explore their interests. Students that already have a strong interest fashion, business, and marketing will be excellent candidates for Vancouver fashion marketing programs. Fashion marketing is a broad field that encompasses a number of topics such as business, marketing, fashion, communications, and even international studies.

Since there are so many interesting aspects of the field, it may even be a good fit for people who may not necessarily be that interested in clothing. Clothing only represents half of the equation because there are so many business skills that come into play as well, so it is the best of both worlds. Here is why you should choose fashion marketing as your major.

What Will You Study as a Fashion Marketing Major?

Fashion marketing is a field of study that teaches students business education in terms of marketing, branding, and management while the fashion side describes clothing, fabrics, textiles, and even culture. The fashion side is very interesting for creative types because they learn what makes certain clothing lines successful and how to spot the latest fashion trends. There will be a discussion of the history of fashion in general as well as fashion across different cultures because most fashion brands are global today.

People with a strong interest in this side of the business should consider attending Vancouver art schools to obtain a stronger background in fashion in general. In terms of business, you will have the opportunity to study market research, brand strategy, and placement.

Practical Experience

Students in Vancouver fashion marketing programs have the opportunity to not only study theory, but they can also take advantage of ways to get hands on experiences as well. Students in Vancouver art schools will usually have several classes that teach them a rudimentary knowledge of how to sew and create clothing. They may also engage in fashion shows and help coordinate and organize them alongside the students that designed the clothing. There will be chances to create mock branding and marketing campaigns. Some fashion marketing programs will have students create focus groups that ask consumers questions about their clothing preferences or they may even study abroad and learn more about international fashion trends. The possibilities are endless.

If you are undecided about your major, then it is a good idea to look into fashion marketing because there are chances are that you will find something of interest.
