Benefits of Meal Plans for Weight Loss by Jennifer Pearl

Article published on March 16th 2012 | Food

Most of the time, weight loss can be achieved by creating a caloric deficit, which happens when you consume fewer calories than your body burns. Consuming fewer calories is a function of oneâ€™s diet. This is best accomplished by adopting a diet of healthy and nutritious low calorie foods. Our bodies are constantly burning calories, but we can increase the number of calories burned through increases physical activities, like exercise. A healthy and sustainable weight loss program, then, should include both exercise and calorie control in order to be successful.

The Exercise and Meal Plans for Weight Loss Combo

In order to create a calorie deficit, youâ€™ll need to spend more or less time exercising depending on how many calories youâ€™re consuming. The average160-pound person will burn 606 calories during an hour of running. A large serving of a cheeseburger can contain 670 calories, while a mixed vegetable salad is usually around 106 calories. So, itâ€™s easy to see how different foods pack vastly different calorie counts, and how much exercise will be required to â€œburn offâ€• higher calorie foods. In other words, the results of an exercise program is supported and enhanced when combined with a nutritious, low calorie meal plan. Some studies even show that diet has a stronger impact on losing weight than physical exercise â€“ though experts agree that a combined approach is best.
