The importance of paint techniques in theatrical productions by

Article published on June 19th 2012 | Art

Unless you are a thespian yourself you may not have taken the time to consider the importance of paint techniques in the staging of theatrical productions. The fact of the matter is that they form a vital part of set design, which along with realistic props is as important to the credibility of a production as actors and a script. Paint techniques are best applied by seasoned professionals with a meticulous attention to detail as well as a creative spark.

Paint techniques are typically employed by set designers working for theatres or television production companies. Of course the primary goal of paint techniques when it comes to both backdrops and props is realism. The illusion of real life comes from accurate and believable artistic creations, which are essential to creating a convincing performance. Paint techniques are therefore used to create mock buildings and props which are integral to a plot.

There is a wide range of paint techniques which are used to create different effects. An experienced designer of sets and backdrops will know exactly what methods are needed to get the desired effects. Therefore whether they are entrusted to recreate a Roman statue, dead body or an Edwardian study they will know which paint techniques are the best ways of making a stage or television production more convincing.

Typically production companies looking to create truly memorable performances enlist the help of specialist firms which have a detailed knowledge of the paint techniques required to create excellent backdrops and props. Even today with the advent of CGI (computer generated images) in cinema there will still always be a place for skilled painters when it comes to set design.

Where can I find a professional who knows their stuff about paint techniques?

When it comes to paint techniques you need to enlist the services of a firm with a portfolio that is second to none. One company which has a wealth of experience creating backdrops and props can be found by paying a visit to Fictionfabricators.co.za.
