All the Comforts of Home: Cozy Bed and Breakfasts in Idaho and Utah by Shanae Buckner

Article published on March 7th 2012 | Travel

A type of accommodation that offers overnight lodging and breakfast in the morning is a bed and breakfast, usually referred to as a B&B. Bed and Breakfasts often have less than ten rooms open for lodging purposes and normally have a shared bathroom for all guests. The breakfast is usually already part of the price paid for the room.

Bed and breakfasts are quite modest by nature. They are ideal for vacationers and travelers who want cozy lodgings at an affordable price. Compared to spacious hotels, the price of accommodations in bed and breakfasts is much lower; though the rooms are much smaller as well. In addition, breakfast is the only meal that bed and breakfasts offer unlike hotels and inns which offer a lot of other meals and provide much more services.

Bed and breakfast lodgings are not really a new concept. For many years, explorers all over the globe, who did not have a lot of money to give, would seek accommodations at private houses instead of inns to save money. B & Bs arose from this practice, and are good for those who just need a rest stop for the night, and continue travelling the morning after.

Bed and breakfasts usually serve as a secondary income generator, although a number are run as primary sources too. Normally, it is the owners themselves who maintain the rooms, make the beds, and make breakfast in the morning. On the other hand, there are a lot of bed and breakfasts that do hire professional staff. However, such establishments are usually under the hotel and inn category.

The bed and breakfast Idaho is honored to recommend to vacationers offers a unique kind of lodging in lieu of the usual hotel or inn. In Idaho, there are a lot of national parks and historic sites, as well as excellent business opportunities in food processing, mining, and other businesses. A lot of vacationers and business travelers look for bed and breakfasts close to their intended locations instead of renting apartments or staying at motels. This way, they can completely experience Idaho.

One other place where bed and breakfasts are conventional is Utah. Because of the flourishing tourism and business opportunities there, tourists and business travelers also seek bed and breakfasts in Utah for the complete Utahan experience. Returning to a bed and breakfast might feel relaxing after going to the Grand Canyon.
