A type of lodging that offers overnight lodging and breakfast in the morning is a bed and breakfast, sometimes called a B&B. Some of the features of a typical bed and breakfast are a shared bathroom for all visitors, and less than ten rooms used for commercial purposes. The breakfast is most of the time already part of the price paid for the room.

Bed and breakfasts are quite modest by nature. They are perfect for tourists and travelers who want homey lodgings at an affordable cost. Compared to full-sized hotels, the price of accommodations in bed and breakfasts is a whole lot lower; though the rooms are a lot smaller as well. In addition, breakfast is the only meal that bed and breakfasts offer unlike hotels and inns which offer a lot of other meals and provide many more services.

Bed and breakfast lodgings are not exactly a new concept. For centuries, travelers all over the world, who could not afford much, would seek accommodations at private houses instead of inns to save money. B & Bs arose from this practice, and are good for those who just need a rest stop for the night, and continue travelling the morning after.

Bed and breakfasts more often than not function as a secondary source of income, though a number are managed as primary sources as well. Normally, it is the owners themselves who clean the rooms, make the beds, and serve breakfast in the morning. On the other hand, there are also bed and breakfasts that have professional staff working in them. Nonetheless, such lodgings belong to the hotel and inn classification.

The bed and breakfast Idaho is proud to present to vacationers offers a unique kind of accommodation in lieu of the normal hotel or inn. In Idaho, there are a lot of national parks and historic sites, as well as good business opportunities in food processing, mining, and other businesses. A lot of tourists and business travelers look for bed and breakfasts near their intended locations instead of renting apartments or staying at motels. This way, they can completely experience Idaho.

One other location where bed and breakfasts are conventional is Utah. Since the place has flourishing tourism and business opportunities, tourists and business travelers also seek bed and breakfasts in Utah for the full Utahan experience. Going back to a bed and breakfast might feel relaxing after going to the Grand Canyon.
