The Many Advantages of Using Draperies in Your Home by Roxie Tenner

At first glance, drapes seem to function just like any other decorative fixture in the house: a decorative item. With their various hues, it is hard to think of drapes having any other function aside from accentuating windows and rooms. But a closer look will reveal that they give us a lot more benefit than what we see.

First of all, drapes can deaden unwanted sounds. Noise is amplified and propagated when it is reflected on hard surfaces such as walls, floors and ceilings. With curtains, these noises are reduced because the fabric used in manufacturing them act like sound absorbers. Curtains also demonstrate soundproof qualities by reducing the level of noise entering a room through a window. Thus, the use of curtains helps provide a quieter environment.

Another advantage is that they help regulate room temperature. With the high cost of electricity these days, energy costs can skyrocket during summer and winter as result of using heating and cooling systems. As curtains insulate well against heat loss or gain, energy costs are reduced by making home owners less reliant on these heating and cooling systems.

Without curtains, a greater transfer of heat occurs through the glass window between the interior and exterior of a home. This results in heat gain with a hotter room during summer and heat loss with a colder room during winter. By acting as a barrier between the widow and room interior, curtains reduce this heat transfer, resulting in a cooler room during summer and a warmer room during winter.

Their versatility also makes them an excellent home item. Curtain tracks are flexible enough to be bent in order to fit window shapes. For example, curtain tracks can be bent to match the angle of an arched window, thereby adding greater elegance to it. Curtains can be made to fit in a wide range of window shapes and structures. Versatility is therefore important when it comes to the type of drapery Philadelphia residents choose for their windows.

Finally, curtains are so much easier to clean. Compared to blinds which tend to trap dust and dirt, curtains provide for easy cleaning, as the curtain poles require little maintenance, and the fabric will need vacuuming only as needed. This is one reason why the drapes Philadelphia residents choose are those designed for minimal maintenance.

If you are having second thoughts about using them, learning more about the kind of drapery Philadelphia residents choose for their homes might help you decide. You can learn more about the advantages of using draperies on articlesnatch.com.
