There are more than one sort of window coverings. Some people think of a window covering as curtain panels while others think of window shutters or screens. Every one of these things are accurate when it comes to things that may be used to effectively and stylishly cover the windows in the house.

In addition, you can even count exterior window shutters, decorative bars, along with other products as a window covering too. Think of elaborate stained glass windows, for example, those would belong to this grouping as well. The bottom line is a window covering is any sort of item that covers a window either partially or completely.

The first kind of window covering was a curtain. Obviously, they didn't call them curtains at the time as they don't even remotely represent what you'd call a curtain nowadays. In early history, a window was a simple hole in the wall of a house. To keep the wind, cold, and bugs out, an animal hide was used to cover the window.

It wasn't long after that the first shutters were utilized as window coverings. It was promptly discovered that shutters made it easier for people to allow air to their houses and were more effective in terms of climate and pest management. As time went on, both shutters and curtains became more detailed, but shutters didn't become a stylish option for home until the 20th century.

It was the early church that started using stained glass as window coverings; the Catholic church, more specifically. Centuries ago, stained glass was utilized to exhibit the richness of the church. Obviously, designs were used to reveal their belief in God and their saints.

Over time, the prosperous also started using elaborate window patterns to supply themselves with privacy while flaunting their prosperity. It allowed them to present creations and scenarios of artwork from the exterior of their home. People could see for themselves what kind of money the family had without ever stepping foot within of the home in question.

In the present society, window coverings come in a variety of ways. A number of people choose strictly curtains to function as a covering for their windows. Actually, because of the affordability of curtains, this is the most common variety of window covering that you'll find. Various other options, including window shutters, tend to be no less than two times as expensive as drapes and are often more expensive than curtains.

Other types of covers for windows have gone out of fashion gradually. Of course, there are numerous restored homes that have an emphasis on stained glass or lead designed windows, but on the whole, the standard house has window coverings or shutters. This does not detract from the fact that other options are beautiful, it's just that these other choices are simply too costly for the ordinary person.
