A Look at Types of Business Insurance by Tracy Narvaez

Article published on April 5th 2012 | Insurance

The main aim of business insurance coverage is to ensure that your venture is secured against any imaginable risk. However, these covers are found in many varying options, which vary depending with amount and cost of the covers. The available options need to be discussed with one's insurance agent or broker. With their help, you will be equipped with the knowledge on various options. Hence, you will make the best choice. Below is an explanation of different covers from which any interested business owner can choose the best.

One type of this cover is called general liability insurance. Many business owners usually purchase this kind of policy to cover for any legal problems that can crop up as a result of accidents, injuries and negligence. This policy protects a business against payments due to property damage, medical expenses, bodily damages, libel, settlement bonds, slander and costs on defending lawsuits.

The other type is product liability insurance. Firms that manufacture products, retail or distribute can be legally responsible for its security. Product liability cover protects the products against any financial loss according to defects the products might cause harm to the body or cause injuries. However, the amount of indemnity you will buy will greatly depend on the products you manufacture or sell. For instance, if you have a clothing store, it is subjected to less risk than someone who has a small appliance store.

In addition, there is professional liability coverage. This cover is mostly for businesses that are occupied with ventures that offer services. In other words, this type of coverage can also be referred to as errors and omissions cover.

This is because, the coverage mainly secures the business from errors, negligence, and malpractices associated with offering services to clients. In some countries, it is mandatory for service businesses such as doctors to have malpractice coverage. However, whether the cover will be compulsory or not is determined by the type of services offered.

Another coverage is commercial property indemnity. This policy mainly covers for risks of fire, smoke, hailstorms, vandalism, wind, or civil disobedience. However, this coverage can be got in two varieties that both cater for losses and damages to the firm. There is the specified risk policy which can only cater for risks stated on the coverage and the risk policy which can cover up for any type of risk either listed or not listed on its terms and conditions.

In addition, there is a home based insurance. Nonetheless, different to the common viewpoint, this kind of insurance does not protect the home based business losses. Therefore, you can opt to add riders to your homeowner's policy in order to cover for the normal business threats such as property damage.

Most importantly, while purchasing the cover, go for that will earn your firm the most benefits. The option taken should cover for all your business requirements. Consider the above explanations while selecting among the various kinds of business insurance cover.
