Owning at least one car is said to be part of the great American dream. However, it seems that the notion that Americans are car-loving individuals turned out to be just a myth these days. There are a significant number of neglected cars and most drivers are obviously careless about the wheels they have.

True enough, most car owners today have bad habits that are cruel to their automobiles. These tendencies may be simple mistakes, but the negative effects that can be inflicted on vehicles definitely go a long way. Hence, it is a must to realize these wrongdoings and shortcomings as early as possible to have ample time for correction. Through that, wheels can be spared from complete ruin and car investments will not go to waste.

Using Brakes Incorrectly

Although most drivers learn how to drive, they never really knew how to wisely use the brake pedals in their cars. Many are unaware about the correct way of applying brakes while parking, shifting, and going downhill. Because of this, they end up with completely worn out pads and stressed transmissions.

Ignoring Car Cries

Drivers should not blame their stereotypes as they are simply too insensitive about the cries and complains that their wheels shout out every day. They tend to ignore unusual sounds which indicate that there is something wrong with their vehicles, and they also do not pay any attention to the other components and basic needs of their automobiles. Before they know it, their cars are already too worn out to start.

Embracing Car Illiteracy

Related to the previous habit is the complete contentment on being car illiterate.
