Most jewellery is included, from bracelets, necklaces, earrings and watches, through to an extensive range of rings, including engagement and wedding rings. For a thoughtful and tasteful jewellers Birmingham based Greville Rositter attracts discerning buyers from all over the world.

When it comes to jewellery and jewellers Birmingham has a historic reputation and a high concentration of suppliers making it the ideal destination for shoppers. For those looking at engagement rings Birmingham offers a huge range of variety and choice.

For those seeking out that perfect ring, the tradition might seem to be there purely to make life difficult, especially if like many you are shopping for your soon or hoped to be fiancÃ© in secret and praying you choose the ring she will love more than any other. Itâ€™s a tough call and one many have traditionally made, but although the first recorded instance of a diamond ring being given to signify betrothal was in 1477 by the somewhat wealthy Archduke Maximilian of Austria, the practice didnâ€™t become common place until the 20th century. Now the ring continues to symbolise unity and eternity with itâ€™s never-ending band, but it wasnâ€™t until the 1930s that diamond rings became popula these days it is estimated that in over 80% of cases an engagement ring set with a precious stone is chosen.

In the 21st century it is becoming more common to find engaged couples shopping together for engagement rings Birmingham way and further afield. This offers the woman her choice and a role in the decision making, whilst avoiding any fractious moments just after the ring is revealed â€“ something of a blessing where a proposal is a stressful thing to plan anyway. In the earlier part of the twentieth century traditions and the law varied from country to country as to the ownership of the ring (if the promise was not fulfilled). Traditionally the ring was a gift and acted as a kind of financial recompense should the bride to be find herself alone after all. The law in the USA however disagreed and in most states the ring is designated a â€˜conditional giftâ€™ conditional upon the marriage taking place, with a whole legal wrangle as to fault if this is disputed. In the UK however, the ring is considered a gift, plain and simple, unless clearly stated otherwise.

When it comes to gifts of all kinds, Greville Rositter is the jewellers Birmingham go to for the jewellery they love to give and the engagement rings Birmingham know will make them very happy, however they are chosen. For rings from their specially selected ranges or for the option of designing a ring as individual as your loved one, come to Birminghamâ€™s fine jewellery shop for many fine and beautiful pieces in one welcoming helpful place.
