On Refund Home Loans and Working with Non-Bank Lenders by Crowin Smith

Article published on February 14th 2012 | Loans

Aside from banks, there are non-bank lenders that offer mortgage lending services. These financial institutions are similar in many ways with traditional banks. They provide consumers with different loan options.

Entering the lending market only in the 90s, non-bank lenders have since increased and established a more competitive market in favour of home buyers. Back in the days, home buyers had to endure the long wait behind desks of loan managers wondering whether their loan applications would get approved or not. At the present, home buyers no longer need to get out of their houses when applying for home loans. The emergence of non-bank or non-traditional mortgage lenders have given way to the creation of new loan products like refund home loans. These loans offer more than the usual loan money for the purchase of properties. Home buyers are given refunds based on the loan amount they seek. This and other modern home loan innovations have created a new wave of mortgage lending options to the benefit of the consumers.

If you are in the market scouting for loans, you should seriously consider approaching non-bank lenders. They might have some really good things to offer you that some traditional banking institutions cannot. Here are some specific examples of what non-bank lenders can offer:

Competitive Mortgage Rates

In order to sway more people to take the â€˜road less takenâ€™ in home ownership, non-bank lenders offe better loans with lower mortgage rates. This is a very good strategy on their part considering growing customer dissatisfaction of customers towards traditional banking institutions.

More Flexible Options

Compared to the major players in the lending industry, non-bank lenders are considered the â€˜new kids on the blockâ€™. Considerably smaller compared to the already established banks, non-bank lenders are willing to exert extra effort to help their clients and nurture their growing customer base.

Higher-Risk Mortgages

Unlike traditional lenders, non-bank lenders are willing to accommodate people who have less stellar credit. They are more open to taking risks, unlike traditional banking institutions that would immediately reject loan applications from people who have questionable credit records.

So, are non-banking lenders worth it? Of course! Looking at things on the larger scale, they provide a promising alternative to traditional lending. However, consumers should still exercise precaution when choosing mortgages. Comparing home loans is still advised, along with the reading of the fine print for every loan product. There might also be a catch to certain perks offered by these non-bank lenders.

Refund home loans offered by non-traditional lenders can provide borrowers with extra cash to fund other personal or mortgage-related expenses. Attractive as these may sound, loan applicants should not forget the fact that mortgages are some of the most expensive debts they would incur.
