Is a Food Broker Right for Your Business?

As a food product developer or owner, one of the biggest challenges is deciding how to sell and deliver your food products to the public. Some businesses choose to personally deliver a set amount of stock of their Foodstuffs NZ to supermarket or other retailers on a weekly or biweekly basis. However, for businesses selling to numerous retailers, or for individuals with no prior food brokerage experience, this can become a tedious chore. An alternative option for delivering stock to purchasing outlets is through the use of a food broker or supermarket broker.

There are many benefits to using a food broker. First, food brokers have existing knowledge of the current market situation. A food brokerwill keep you updated on local market conditions and provide you with personalised recommendations that will benefit the Grocery Sales Agencies of your product, additionally saving you time and cutting back on market research costs. Secondly, a food or supermarket broker will have existing professional relationships with supermarkets and other buyers. This is why it is important to select a trusted supermarket broker. Your food broker can easily get your product connected with the appropriate buyers, and you donâ€™t have to spend time and energy building and fostering relationships with the buyers. In addition to saving you the time and headache of researching retail outlets and meeting buyers, a supermarket broker generally has a great deal of experience selling a range of products, negotiating contracts and ending user calls. Without having to personally manage these activities, you will have much more time to focus on product development.

Once you decide to use the services of a supermarket broker, the next step is selecting the right supermarket broker for your line of products. You must determine whether you want to use an independent food broker or a food brokerage house. Independent food brokers can be more economical and dedicate personalised time to your specific product, however, they may not be as reliable and donâ€™t always have as many professional connections as a food
