Like all mechanical devices that move and are used extensively, cars are subject to wear and tear. Whether your car is brand new or used, it needs maintenance to prevent early deterioration. It's the law of nature: Age slows down motion and function; and it's unavoidable.

While new cars would initially require minor maintenance, a used car would require maintenance frequently and regularly. To keep older cars running smoothly, it is important to observe basic maintenance schedules which provide a longer useful service life for the vehicle. This helps the owner save money in the long term by maintaining the car's efficiency and avoiding major repair costs.

Car owners do not really have to bring their vehicles into a shop for maintenance and repair very often. Basic car maintenance is usually simple, and can be done by the owner himself. This includes simple concerns such as maintaining proper tire pressure, and making sure that there is enough gas, oil, and radiator coolant to keep the vehicle running. This helps optimize the operation of the vehicle and ensure efficiency.

Regular oil changes and periodic checks on transmission and brake fluid levels are simple but important procedures any one can do to maintain his car. Other useful measures are making sure that the battery is in good condition, and its terminals clean. Being sure the radiator has no leaks and contains enough coolant is also helpful. It is also easy to do a visual check on the wiring and hoses in the engine compartment to be sure there are no potential problems.

A regular tune-up will contribute in no small manner to a more efficient vehicle. In everything though, the owner should refer to the vehicle's manual for the proper maintenance schedules. Anyone who has bought a used car Edmonton based dealers carry would be well advised to have his vehicle maintained regularly at the dealership's service centre.

Usually, an older car needs to have some of its parts replaced over its lifetime. In some instances, repair is not adequate to fix a problem, necessitating replacement of parts.
