What is Liberty Village in Toronto, Ontario, Canada, all about, you ask? If you have been paying even just a little bit of attention to the various neighborhoods of Toronto, you undoubtedly must have heard of this location by now. According to some people who are in the know, it is actually the hottest neighborhood in all of the city of Toronto. It goes without saying that, in a neighborhood this trendy, the condos there are highly sought after, to say the least. Only as recently as 2004 did Liberty Village see a boom with regard to growth, which means that its stellar growth has hardly peaked yet.

Its location is regarded as being one of the nicest in all of Toronto, in part, because of how centrally situated it is to everything important. To wit, Liberty Village is solely a 5-minute distance to the Lakeshore, a 20-minute stroll to Torontoâ€™s financial hub and simply a 10-minute walk to the gallery/fashion/entertainment district that is marked by Ossington, West Queen West, King St. West, Wellington St. West and Dundas St. West. The explosion of the growth of Liberty Village has come at the same time as the broader gentrification of downtown Toronto in general, which is in part marked by both artists as well as younger professionals moving west into less established areas, too.

The kind of urban growth that has characterized Liberty Village has come in the form of hot, new condos and condo developments, lofts, new parks, additional office space and a host of both restaurants and shops. Part of the charm of this trendy neighborhood is how undesirable buildings, such as old factories, have actually been rejuvenated into lofts, gyms, restaurants, galleries and even furniture stores. This makes sense when you consider that before its gentrification and aggressive development, Liberty Village was actually an industrial area.

For example, the Toronto Carpet Factory Building that is located on Mowat Avenue as well as its enveloping structures of industrial buildings is a notorious example of the 1900s-style, turn-of-the-century industrial architecture that used to typify this neighborhood. Of course, all that is in the past, as today, the Toronto Carpet Factory Building is actually home to marketing companies, media firms, tech companies and design firms. Additionally, the heart of Liberty Village is punctuated by structures associated with the old Massey Ferguson Head Office and the old Inglis Factory, which is more evidence of the industrial background of this now-trendier neighborhood of Toronto.

Today, some of the landmarks that have revitalized this neighborhood include Lamport Stadium, which sits on the site of the now-demolished and infamous Andrew Mercer Reformatory for Women. Furthermore, the offices that are attracting more and more professionals to the neighborhood can be mainly found in the west end of Liberty Village. Residential projects, such as the new and hip condos, are currently centered on East Liberty Street. Some 20 new restaurants have also opened up in this neighborhood in just the last 3 years.

When you drop in on this trendiest neighborhood in all of Toronto, do yourself a favor: Check out the condos in the area. With all of the new construction projects and condo developments, you just might be able to find the condo of your dreams in Liberty Village, the hottest neighborhood in all of Toronto.
