The Benefits of Renting Houses in Huntsville, Alabama by Tyrone Swopes

Article published on April 24th 2012 | Real Estate

One of the biggest investments you make in a lifetime is the home. You canâ€™t do without houses because these serve as places of protection and relaxation. You can choose to buy homes, or you can rent.

Of course, with house investments, the first thing to do is to consider financial capacity to buy your desired house. For instance, if you live in Huntsville, Alabama, chances are, your annual income is more or less $59,928 as estimated by the Census Bureau. Note that $59,928 is before deductions from personal income taxes, medical care, social security, and all other expenses.

Now, let us look at the home values. In 2010, the median value of Huntsville houses is $160,407. For typical families, it would take years before they can buy a house because most of the $59,928 will go to paying taxes, deductions, and family expenditures. Whatâ€™s the use of living in a house if you have to worry about other everyday concerns like food, clothing, transportation, and much more?

In contrast, the 2010 median rental rate in Huntsville is $734 per month. This means that the typical Huntsville household will pay around $8,000 per year. In effect, the payments for rent can be evenly distributed over time, as opposed to the lump sum or installment payments needed to purchase a home.

Renting houses in Huntsville Alabama has other advantages over buying them. The general repair and maintenance for rented houses is usually the responsibility of the landlord. The landlord is also financially responsible for any improvements made on the rented property. The rental rate may include property taxes and insurance, as well as utilities. If you wish to change addresses, itâ€™s relatively easy to do so with a rented house because the lease has a fixed end date.

Of course, Houses for rent in Huntsville AL wonâ€™t just show up on your doorstep. You need to go out and find them. You can walk around the neighborhood, become familiar with the place, and ask for recommendations on the most strategic locations in Huntsville. You can browse listings online, bulletin boards in local businesses, and real estate offices.

The houses for rent Huntsville AL families can live in should enable these families to live a quality life. Renting being relatively inexpensive compared with buying should not be an excuse for families to live in less-than-ideal houses.
