The phrase â€œInternet marketingâ€• has a very broad scope. Essentially, it refers to all kinds of marketin done online. This includes company websites, pop-up ads in these websites, e-mail marketing, and marketing via wireless devices.

To market via websites, companies should be able to strike the balance between aesthetic appeal and user-friendliness in the design of these websites. Users are not likely to be interested in exploring a website containing only black-and-white text; likewise, users may be annoyed at websites that are overloaded with flashy graphics which make website loading difficult. After creating the websites, companies should make sure that these websites can be found easily by users. This is done through search engine optimization (SEO).

The process of planning and creating websites is called web design. Companies determine the content in the websites, the layout, the media (e.g. articles, blog posts, slide shows, videos, music) to convey their messages, and the coloring, among others. Therefore, people with knowledge of interactive multimedia and graphic design are needed.

Search engine optimization can be done in several ways. Ever wondered how all those companies that put up websites earn their profits without directly taking a single cent from the pockets of Internet surfers? One type of SEO is social media optimization (SMO) or social SEO. Social media optimization is using data gathered from social media sites like Facebook to attract visitors to websites.

An observant Facebook user will notice that there are links to websites located at the right side of their news feeds and profile pages which are somehow related to the interests indicated by the user on his profile. For instance, a resident of the city of San Diego, California who has â€œlikedâ€• a Faceboo page about San Diego will likely see several websites lining the side bar of the profile page about good travel spots in San Diego. This shows that SMO is a form of Internet marketing San Diego companies can really use to their advantage.

San Diego Internet marketing is more than web design and SEO. The primary aim of marketing is to meet a (potential) customer need which, ideally, has not been met before. If this need has been met, then the marketing strategy of a company should concentrate on standing out from among the competition.

Considering the tough competition with other San Diego companies in the online world, San Diego Internet marketing companies should deliver only the best results to their clients. These companies can start with good web designing. To learn more about web design, follow this link: sixrevisions.com/web_design/250-quick-web-design-tips-part-1/.
