Standards have to be created in international trade in order to prevent any ambiguity that may arise since these ambiguities are a big barrier to trade. This is the reason for the birth and growth of ISO. ISO today stands for International Organization for Standardization but this was not so when ISO was born. The name ISO was actually derived from the Greek word â€œISOâ€• that meant equal. This word was adopted in order to prevent different acronyms arising from the translation of the English expansion into different languages.

There are ISO standards on virtually every topic barring a few such as IT and electronic and telecommunication standards. The organization started functioning in 1926 and today there are more than 18,500 standards with new ones coming in every day. Due to the vastness and complexities involved in ISO, there are specialist groups that provide guidance to interested companies and businesses in obtaining the necessary ISO certification. These groups provide ISO training so that business houses have competent personnel that will see them through till the successful certification phase and beyond. With the facility of the Internet and faster communication systems, it is possible now to undergo ISO online training as well, from the professional groups.

ISO training and successful certification has several advantages. These are the creation of a more effective and efficient operation. Customer satisfaction is increased while retention of customers is assured. ISO reduces audits and enhances marketing. The employee is motivated and his awareness increases. The ultimate result is an increase in profit and productivity with a corresponding reduction is wastage.

ISO training offered by various groups dealing with business management systems includes training in ISO standards such as 9001, 14001, 27001 and 50001. There are other standards as well such as OHSAS 18991 and AS 9100C besides R2 and R2/RIOS.

The ISO online training generally involves courses on ISO standards such as 9001, 14001, 27001 and 50001. ISO online training is meant for managers and internal auditors. These are necessary in order to guide them in learning a certain ISO standard so that they can better maintain the relevant ISO certification of their business house.
