A New & Fresh Website Re-Energises the Energy Comparison Industry by Alexander

Article published on November 26th 2011 | Business

With suppliers such as British Gas and Scottish Power, bringing out new ways of monitoring energy consumption and managing costs, while continually being bombarded by information on the costs of energy suppliers from all sides, how can a consumer be expected to make a fully informed decision, when the information they are given keeps changing?

This websites answer to this is a section by section breakdown of the various offers that each of the top energy suppliers can offer, thereby allowing consumers to easily benefit from the impartial comparison overviews of all the options available, provided in easy to understand terminology.

Demythologising the various technical and marketing terminology that energy suppliers use, is a key aspect of the information available through this website. By dividing each of the energy suppliers up into sections which cover everything from tariffs and add-on services, to servicing and maintenance offers consumers a more fully informed picture of how each provider handles energy supply which in turn gives the consumer the necessary knowledge to make an informed decision based upon knowledge of all the facts.

In order for any comparison to be made, it is understood that a consumer needs to have an awareness of the relevant factors and thereby there is a necessity for the right information to be at a consumer's fingertips. To that end, the information provided through the advice guides on this website, is not narrowed to the solely financially relevant, but also includes perspectives and details which bring in ethical and environmental concerns, such as information renewable energy and the avenues.

In the same way as ethical and environmental concerns may affect consume choice, lifestyle choices such as online or paper statements may also affect a choice and to this end there are various comparison tables included on the site which compare the various options from a more household and lifestyle centred perspective.

Through depicting information such as the flexibility of various packages, in terms of what can be added onto them, whether it be EnergySmart from British Gas, or Unifi from Scottish Power these tables allow the consumer to take a less financially angled viewpoint. By having information such as how various options may be billed, for example in paper or online and how they can be paid the consumer is able to consider if one or another package may even fit in to their particular lifestyle or household.

The wealth of unique information offered allows consumers to take into account a larger variety of factors, not purely the financial. The inevitable outcome of the availability of this information is the right decision, and a sense of security about the control of their energy supply.
