Amazon Gold Ventures-What it takes to be a jeweler by Amazongold Ventures

Article published on February 2nd 2012 | Business

Jewelers from Amazon to China create customized items made of precious metals for clients -- from simple bracelets to sophisticated rings that alert one of the wearer's status.

A jewel designer usually starts by discussing with clients what design concepts they have in mind. From that sketch, a technical drawing is then created to a scale. And since the popularization of computer aided designs, the technical model is rendered digitally in a 3D form to serve as basis for the casting and setting.

And it's not just all about art skills. There are also technical aspects of the job, the same way that an architect needs expertise to start a project. The jeweler must have a good understanding of jewelry creation, what would look good on a specific client, etc.

Every client consultation is expectedly unique, for people sometimes want to have a more antique look on the jewelry they are requesting, or already have an accurate picture of what they like and would just like to tweak it a bit.

Some designs are more vintage, coming from inspirations from Amazon landscapes. On the other hand, there were also more trendy designs and colors that alert onlookers, derived from the more expressive trends at present.

The thing is, the variety in clients' inclinations help a lot. When something is customized for a very specific purpose, it tends to become more meaningful for the clients.

The most challenging part of the work will be the part where the clients are not sure what they want to have. Having a creative mindset is an asset, especially in drawing out what the clients are actually looking for.

Either clients would have no idea what they like or they would have a variety of things they want to experiment on. As a result, jewel designers have to spend much time with the clients in order for them to figure out the best option. You have to be able to communicate effectively and have patience in every transaction.

To give you an idea how much a jeweler earns in a year, entry-level salaries amount to USD 23,050 while those with significant experience can have up to USD 50,000.

Aspiring jewelers can learn of the trade from vocational schools offering such courses or even on by distance-learning centers. Still, there are those who hone their skill in making or designing jewelry through on-the-job training.
