Hitting a utility post or the rear of a car may be one thing; but hitting an innocent pedestrian or bystander, intentional or not, is a different story. There are as many crossings and sidewalks for people as highways for cars all across the United States. In spite the wide space of Americaâ€™s freeways, more than 4,000 pedestrians lost their lives in car accidents in 2009 according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

Every finger points to two common culprits responsible for these ill-fated events: bad driving and an ill car. When a driver puts the pedal to the metal just to feel what it is like to satisfy his need for speed, he is strongly likely to hit somebody ore something he should not. Similarly, if the car is in bad shape or in no condition to take to the road, the chance of a pedestrian mishap is also very likely. Regardless whether he means it or not, the driver is liable.

How can drivers avoid getting into trouble? Simply enough, follow the rules of the road, and make sure your car is in pristine condition. It is for this reason that traffic safety officials and experts endorse defensive driving at all times. It is also the reason why they also remind the public about having the car checked by a mechanic every now and then. Drivers are responsible for their cars, their fellow motorists, and everyone around them.

Sure enough, the cops would not let even the most famous stars in Hollywood to do 65 on a 55-mph highway. Even rally drivers practice slowing down to navigate tight turns and avoid colliding with things they should not collide with. Any Indianapolis Ford dealer indubitably believes in safe driving. Besides, it would be a waste if the newly bought car is impounded because it was floored.

The driver is also responsible for the well-being of his vehicle: engine, brakes, fuel, windshield, and others. Indianapolis Ford dealers have service centers that can be venues for repair and maintenance offered at affordable prices. The service may cost you some money, but it is nothing compared with several years in jail plus payment for damages.

Learn to give crossing men, women, and children the right of way, and they will give you one in return. The red light only lasts for a few minutes, so you will definitely get to your destination no matter what. Indianapolis Ford dealers will appreciate seeing less wreckages at their service centers.
