The cards come in different dollar amounts (their â€œdenominationâ€• or â€œface valueâ€•), often $5, $1 per card, or in minutes, such as 30, 60, or 90 minutes per card. Different cards charge different per-minute rates. Before you purchase a card, ask about how many minutes of calling time you will have. With some cards, when you buy more minutes, you get a better per-minute price.

Instead of minutes, some providers indicate how many â€œunitsâ€• are on the card. A unit equals one minute calling time for calls placed within the continental United States. On calls to Alaska and Hawaii and to other countries, you may be charged more than one unit for every minute you are on the phone.

International Prepaid calling cards have a toll-free access number to initiate your call and include an individual Personal Identification Number (PIN). For security, the PIN is usually hidden by a label or scratch-off coating that you remove after buying the card. To place a call, dial the access number and follow the recorded instructions. Usually, after you enter the PIN, youâ€™ll hear a recording about your available minutes or remaining balance.

There are various types of these calling cards or cheap phone cards that are available. The variation in the calling cards depends on the use for the card. There are some cards that are used exclusively for international calls and there are also others that are used mainly for people who call others within the city. The value of each of these cards may vary and the talk time that is available for a card may depend on these factors.

The person using these cards does not really need to carry cash to make phone calls from and to various places. This is because of the value and the talk time that is stored in these cards.
