Clearing Wrong Notions about Laser Hair Removal by Tobi Fistcher

Article published on June 7th 2012 | Business

Assuming that your hair will never grow again after undergoing a laser hair removal treatment can be a mistake-an acceptance of the most significant mistaken belief regarding the said process. To continue to be hair-free, laser hair removal patients may need to return for another treatment-typically after a year.

Laser hair removal works via selective photothermolysis. During the treatment, the laser weakens the melanin, the dark matter surrounding the follicle. The follicle is the section of the skin that grows the hair. Laser is directed to the follicle and does not affect the remaining skin, so it's unusual to feel any pain throughout the operation.

The reason for hair regrowth is not the inadequacy of the procedure but the fact that hair is growing in cycles. The affected hair follicles and melanin heal and hair roots reestablish themselves. At any particular time, about 80% of your hair develops, 10% starts to grow, and the other 10% sheds. This hair cycle needs clients to undergo around three to four follow-up treatments before all the hair in the problem area ceases developing. These succeeding sessions are determined by the specialist according to hair regrowth on your subsequent visit.

Chemotherapy is an instance of a treatment where hair loss and hair development can occur to a patient. When a person goes through chemotherapy, his/her hair falls out because the treatment kills the cells that trigger hair growth. But when the chemotherapy cycle is completed, hair may begin to grow once more over time or not depending on the dosage of chemotherapy administered.

Both men and women can get any laser hair removal operation done, but ladies account for most of the laser hair removal clients. This is typically done on areas of the body that a patient no longer wishes to perennially shave like the abdomen, bikini line, legs, chest, arms, upper lip, and underarms. Los Angeles laser hair removal experts attest that the most complicated areas to treat are the legs, back and face since hair is heavy in these areas.

Laser hair removal is the most effective solution for hair growth problems. After several therapies, the hair growth cycle ultimately slows down until such a time when you do not need as many treatments for the laser hair removal Los Angeles has to offer.
