Overview on Freight Trucking

In the early days the invention of the train provided the early settlers easy access to the rest of the country. Trains were used to transport people and goods across country but they were slow and dangerous. They also had a limit to what areas they could travel. Since then motor freight trucking has become the king of the highway. The trucking industry has taken over the distribution of all types of freight. Their large van or trailer areas can hold a lot of merchandise and the trucks can pretty much go wherever a car can go. Shipping by truck has been a major factor in the United States economy. When shipping by truck you can take that orange which is grown in Florida and send it to California while it is still fresh. The trucking industry has allowed freight distribution to anywhere in the continental US at a much faster pace than trains.
