Employee Robbery: Obstructing It Effectively by Employing Security Firms by Harvey Shepherd

Article published on April 20th 2012 | Business

The risk of experiencing some form of employee theft is something that businessesâ€”regardless of their size or industryâ€”will constantly have to contend with. Ninety-five percent of all businesses have fallen victim to employee thievery at some pointâ€”a projection that is not far from reality. This spells negative news for business owners and supervisors as their companies' potential is being impeded as a consequence of such a malevolent activity. Moreover, research have shown that over 30% of all bankruptcies are the result, directly or indirectly, of employee thievery.

Employee burglary comes in lots of types such as falsifying profit and productivity reports, stealing from the stockroom and selling products personally, falsifying refunds and keeping the funds, and hundreds of other unlawful acts. Looking at it closely, theft typically takes place when enterprise owners have a tendency to trust their personnel excessively. Though there is nothing wrong with trusting a worker, there is no denying the reality that s/he can switch sides at some point. A business is not a charity institutionâ€”vigilance is really a necessary evil.

According to a worldwide study in 2003 by Ernst & Young, a professional services firm, company workers were the perpetrators of incidents of fraud around 85% of the time. Of that division, more than 50% were from management. If you do not want to suffer from the detrimental effects of employee theft, you may want to consider employing the services of a trustworthy security company.

Security providers can minimize the chances of pilfering in the clientâ€™s establishments. Some use expertly-trained security guards to physically defend the area, while others employ complex video monitoring to survey a physical location. In any case, you can have peace of mind that the working environment is safe against both internal and external problems.

Miami-based businesspeople, both budding and experienced, will find the services of a dependable security company Florida residents prefer quite advantageous. Miami is a major leader in finance, commerce, culture, entertainment, and international trade. It is home to numerous big companies, both multinational and regional, which means corporate robbery is likely to transpire in the city. In fact, Miami had a 74% theft average back in 2011.

When selecting a security company in Miami, you need to first determine what has to be guarded. For example, set your focus on the warehouse if your primary concern is protecting the inventory. Typically, setting up security cameras and alarms can do the job.

As harsh as it may be, surveillance is sometimes essential to protect your organizational assets. With the aid of the security company Miami entrepreneurs prefer, you can rest assured that the company premises are constantly safe.
