For the Love of Cars: the Perks of Owning a Second Vehicle by Brittanieholderness

Article published on April 23rd 2012 | Business

According to a study by the Experian Automotive, people in the United States seem very much in love with automobiles as there is a national average of 2.28 vehicles every household. The most common pairing of vehicles among households is a tandem of a full-sized pickup truck and a standard, mid-range vehicle. If you've been having second thoughts about purchasing another car, perhaps itâ€™s time you give it some serious thought.

Scott Waldron, the president of Experian Automotive, further opines Americans place a high value on owning vehicles and in having two or more in their garage, regardless of where they live or what they earn. While there is some truth to this, buying a second vehicle by impulse or due to vanity should be avoided at all costs. Purchase a car for the right reasons, or it will just end up eating garage space and monthly income.

Owning two vehicles may seem like overkill, but it does make a lot of sense for large families. Two vehicles can serve different purposes: one is for going to and from work, while the other is for taking on weekend family trips. In addition, a backup vehicle comes in handy when one of your cars suddenly breaks down. It saves you from the trouble of relying on public transportation systems which operated on fixed schedules.

Households with teenage children may also find it convenient to have two cars. There may come a point when your child will ask for a vehicle of his or her own for reasons like going to school, hanging out with friends, and others. Instead of letting your child borrow your carâ€“which may result in schedule conflictsâ€“why not buy a separate car?

Vehicles are daily necessities especially in the city of Indianapolis. Indianapolis is the 12th largest city in the United States, meaning it would take a lot of walking to get from point A to B. In addition, transportation systems may not always be reliable. To cope with these things, why not consider the models sold at car dealerships in Indianapolis and start shopping?

Indianapolis car dealerships offer a wide range of vehicle choices, ranging from mid-sized cars to luxury cars. They also offer auto financing to help you get the vehicle of your dreams despite not having sufficient cash in hand. Surf the Internet to do an initial search on dealerships near your area.

Since owning two cars may cost a small fortune, consider buying used cars instead. Used car dealerships in Indianapolis offer vehicles that cost almost half the price of new ones. For more car shopping tips, log on to Edmunds.com.
