Get Certified and Win a Federal Business Contract by Steven Brown

Article published on January 17th 2012 | Business

Small Business Administration (SBA) is one most popular agency tasked to support the prospective small business ventures of the country especially those are lagging behind due to social or economical restraints. Therefore, being a woman or a member of the disadvantaged demographic group is no more a drawback; rather you have greater opportunities to explore to the business world. SBA minority business certification programs not only help the small businesses get an access to the government contracts, they also provide expert advice to take the venture to the next level. In other words, the program smoothens the way to success for the small disadvantaged companies. Now the matter is how to get certified by the SBA?

Only saying you are a disadvantaged business veteran will not help you win a grant; list of eligibility criteria are there to evaluate the business status of the companies to determine if they really deserve the grant or have the potential to do business with the federal government. An applicant has to be an US resident to the very first place as the end goal of the program is to build up a stronger economy for the people lagging behind and so for the nation. Well, even though you get certified, doing business with the federal government is never that easy. The huge exposure will make you compete with the giant industries those are reining the market for years. So, you should not expect success immediately after being certified by the small business development program. A strong business focus is essential to mark your stand to the market.

8a Certification is one most popular program that people mostly opt for. Well, one bitter fact is, eligibility criteria for the 8A program are stringent and many applicants end up being rejected for not being able to meet the conditions perfectly. Apart from that the application process is lengthy and pretty time consuming. These are the reasons why you need to evaluate your business status first to find if you really meet the eligibility conditions before investing your time and effort to the process. One time rejection of the application makes an applicant ineligible for the next 6 months which is actually frustrating for the small business owners seeking for the opportunities to grow and get established.

Not only the minority group of individuals but the women business owners can also opt for the 8A Certification program. This is because to the business world, the women entrepreneurs are always considered to be the minority and so they are eligible for the minority business certification grants. Now, as more and more people and coming into business and inevitably opting for the minority certification programs, it is no more a cakewalk for the small businesses to win a grant. However, you donâ€™t have to worry as the small business consultants are there to help the applicants. You can hire the professionals to get complete support throughout the program. They will not only make you get certified b the agency but also will help you to win a federal grant beating our giant competitors.
