When you are shopping around for some garments with a rain protection feature, here are a few things you need to keep in mind. The first is that of functionality. The main job of rain protection clothing is that it keep you dry. You have to look into how long a garment will retain its water proofing. After a certain amount of time every garment will need to be touched up in order to give you the service that you require. This is especially in cases where water proofing will have to be sprayed on. Also water proof clothing largely falls in the soft shell category which means that it can protect you only so much for a drizzle and not in a heavy downpour.

The level of comfort is the next thing to look into. This is where you examine its ability to allow your body to breathe. You will find advertizing screaming itself hoarse on the product being able to let you breathe, but only a test of time will tell. Besides the technology used in the creation of fabric itself, the inclusion of vents, your bodyâ€™s metabolism as well as the humidity and temperature you are using will matter. The kind of clothing you have on under the gear is important as well.

You will need to assess the durability of the fabric. Those like nylon and polyester come in varying densities and weight. What you should aim for is a 70 denier type material which is often created in three distinct layers. If you are not going to be scaling large altitudes then it would be best to cut down on the ounces in the fabric and go lightweight

How you look will also make a difference. You want to look stylish and not like something that stepped off the ramp at a clinical display show. If you are headed for the wilderness, then you should look at trim tailoring. This also you to pack it easily and the alignment of the pockets will not come in the way of your backpack or your climbing paraphernalia.

The more sophisticated your gear the more expensive it is going to be. When it comes to high quality fabrics you are looking at great tailoring and attention to detail. This will go right down to the little rivets on your buttons. Lower cost water proof clothing can be easy on the pocket, but they are not usually breathable materials making them rather uncomfortable to be in.
