There are dozens of personal injury attorneys in Pittsburgh. Finding the right one doesn't have to add to your pain after you've suffered an injury or accident. There are four important things to look for in a personal injury attorney that can help make your search less painful.

What Special Knowledge Does the Attorney Have?

While there are basic qualifications common to all licensed attorneys, most attorneys focus on one or more areas of practice. An attorney who has focused in the area of personal injury will be better prepared to present your case in the most effective way possible. He or she will be familiar with recent developments in personal injury case law, and will have a system in place to organize the progression of your case. The law firm may have assembled a team of experts including medical professionals such as physical therapists and nurses. Pittsburgh truck accident attorneys will be familiar with log book regulations and truck maintenance requirements, as well as safety issues regarding certain makes and models.

What Experience Does the Attorney Have?

Suppose your injury occurred as the result of an accident with a truck. Pittsburgh truck accident attorneys will be familiar with detailed issues of motor vehicle law that can affect your claim, as well as recent court rulings on similar issues.

Looking at the attorney's track record can help you feel confident in his recommendations. Does he only advocate for injury victims, or does he also represent insurance companies or defendants? Has he won similar cases in the past?

Is Your Personal Injury Attorney Willing to go to Trial?

Most personal injury suits are settled out of court, and a knowledgeable personal injury attorney will know whether a settlement offer is reasonable, or a low-ball attempt to make your claim go away. He or she will be able to negotiate terms at a settlement conference, or prepare for mediation. But if those avenues fail, your attorney will be an aggressive advocate for you in court.

Can You Work with the Attorney?

Working with a team instead of a sole practitioner can have several advantages. Multiple attorneys will have an expanded knowledge base from which to draw. The team may be able to devise more effective strategies than an individual. It's common for personal injury attorneys in Pittsburgh to work closely with paralegals and other support staff to make most effective use of their time. While you need an attorney you can work with, it's more important to have a skilled advocate than a new best friend.

Having the best possible representation might not make your pain go away. But it can get you fast, fair compensation for your injuries.
