When buying a used car, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish a superior car from a lemon car. Your judgment must not depend entirely on age and appearance since some brand new cars can be lemon if they are flooded or if some auto parts are missing. Even so, there are steps that you can follow to effectively determine whether the used car youâ€™ve been dreaming to buy is lemon.

In the automobile industry, â€œlemonâ€• is the term used to refer to a defective car. Regardless of the cause of defectiveness, a car that does not function according to standards can be tagged as lemon. One way to find out is by checking with the used car dealer if the used car has a record of recall repair. If there is, chances are the car might have been working badly for a long time or maybe a vital auto part is in its dying stage.

Rust is also a strong indicator of defect. Look under the hood and on other mechanical components and claddings for corrosion. One of the main causes of excessive corrosion on some parts is wetting, which may indicate that the used car was flooded or some of the parts where replaced with substandard ones.

Pings and knocks as you step on the pedal may indicate defect in the engine and other components of the used carâ€™s mechanical system. Drive the car on different types of surfaces and observe how it will respond. Watch for strange noises that sound like the used car is in real trouble pulling itself together.

Indianapolis is a nice place to go looking for quality used cars. Mazda Indianapolis dealerships in this industrialized city make it easy for car buyers to identify a lemon car and eventually avoid it. If you want to buy used cars for sale in Indianapolis, check the tires for wear and tear. Measure the wear by the depth of the tread and decide whether thereâ€™s an immediate need to replace the tires so that you can avoid extra expenses right after you buy it.

The paint on the exterior components is also a good indicator of defect. Mismatched pain color, thickness, shade, or stroke means the car was refurbished to hide some uncanny damage. Be sure to check used cars for sale in Indianapolis from the inside out to determine if theyâ€™re lemon or not.
