How to Make a Decision Between Spots for a Salon by Eric K Blair

Article published on April 17th 2012 | Business

Given that salons are one of the few company types that usually relies on impulse to get folks through the door for the first time, picking the right place for the services is of the utmost importance. Picking a not-so-good location without proper planning can make it extremely difficult to get people through the door the very first time and get the word out. The area can change things a lot, but understanding the pros and cons of each kind of location is a good way to get a concept of what would work best for the company.

Attracting foot traffic is one of the things that salons depend upon, and opening near other businesses helps a whole lot. These can be in a standalone building or a strip mall in accordance with the area the options are provided in. The cost of rent is normally pretty reasonable, but since there are so many other variables, this can be more of a factor than predicted. To bring folks in and deter them from the competition, it is important to have a great looking and visible sign for people to see. While it is very good to not count on it, other varieties of advertising may not be needed; people telling each other will often work great on its own.

There are some benefits to beginning in a less crowded area as well, but it may also make driving people in harder. Given that these locations usually provide rent for much less money, it can be rather important to use other means of attracting customers, like television ads. Storage is typically very easy since salon equipment can be put out of the way easily and the salon chairs can be placed with a good bit of comfortable room around them effortlessly. Marketing in these situations is a huge deal since that will be the primary method that individuals find and discover the business through, and this will often outweigh the less expensive rent.

Finally, opening a store inside a shopping mall can provide a huge boost in clientele, but this option also usually carries the highest rent amount. Beginning businesses should look to open in the busiest portions of the mall, especially since one placed in an obscure corner can be pricey and useless. The only problem that arises in these situations is that the better locations usually cost a premium and provide less usable area as well. Just like if a business is put in a strip mall, the companyâ€™s interior design and sign should be made to look attractive from the hall area to advertise the quality the business provides, and not look drab and unattractive.
