Assuming that your hair will not grow again after having a laser hair removal treatment can be a mistake-an affirmation of the greatest mistaken belief regarding the said process. To remain hair-free, laser hair removal patients may need to return for an additional session-generally after a year.

Laser hair removal operates through selective photothermolysis. Throughout the operation, the laser damages the melanin, which is the dark matter surrounding the follicle. The follicle is the part of the skin that grows the hair. Laser is directed to the follicle and does not impact the remaining portion of the skin, so it's uncommon to feel any sort of unpleasantness throughout the operation.

The reason for hair regrowth is not the ineffectiveness of the procedure but the fact that hair is growing in cycles. The damaged hair follicles and melanin heal and hair roots reestablish on their own. At any given time, about 80% of your hair develops, 10% starts to grow, and the remaining 10% falls out. This hair cycle calls for people to go through around 3 to 4 follow-up sessions before all the hair in the problem area stops developing. These succeeding sessions are determined by the physician according to hair regrowth on your subsequent visit.

Chemotherapy is an example of a treatment where hair loss and hair growth can happen to a patient. When a person undergoes chemotherapy, his/her hair falls out since the treatment kills the cells that trigger hair growth. But when the chemotherapy cycle is done, hair may start to grow again over time or not depending on the dosage of chemotherapy given.

Both men and women can get any laser hair removal operation done, but women account for most of the laser hair removal clients. This is typically done on areas of the body that a client no longer wants to perennially shave like the abdomen, legs, bikini line, chest, upper lip, arms, and underarms. Los Angeles laser hair removal specialists attest that the most difficult areas to treat are the back, legs and face because hair is heavy in these areas.

Laser hair removal is the most reliable answer for hair development problems. After several treatments, the hair development cycle eventually slows down until such a time when you don't need as many therapies for the laser hair removal Los Angeles has to offer.
