Most of us think that moving is a one day thing and that all of the packing work should be done on that day itself. We often do so because we feel that reducing the number of hours put into the move and making it through in the least amount of time possible, makes a move less stressful on oneself and the family.

However this is not the case. Cramming up the entire packing process into a few hours will easily lead to denting, cracking and eventually the loss of precious possessions. This is simply because everything is done hastily and haste leads to minor accidents that in-turn lead to the loss of goods and cutlery.

The packing process should begin almost a good 4 days prior to moving day. This will give you the time and the patience to complete the packaging gradually and without haste. Having so much time at hand even along with a work week will give you enough time to think and re-think what, how, why and where to store your goods.

Consolidating items in one room of the house everyday will give you enough time to conveniently package the goods yourself. It is always wise to begin with the bedrooms and on the last day wind up in the kitchen because it is the space that will be used right up till the minute you move out. Also keep a lot of boxes and filler material at hand along with a sheet of paper in which you can fill in what item is in which box. This makes unpacking in your new home or apartment even simpler since you know which box can be placed where and unpacked.

Lastly if you find all of this to be a hassle and do not have the time and the patience then itâ€™s wise that you call in the experts at The Box.
