Make your innovative ideas safe from being copied. Patenting is more than simply meeting the formal requirements of a patent office. You should try your patent application fits into the broader framework of development of their invention.

At some point will have to legally protect your intellectual property (IP) or not:

* Safely disclose.

* To be recognized as its legitimate owner.

* Benefit from commercial exploitation.

* Prevent or deter unauthorized use by third parties.

There are various forms of protection, known as industrial property rights (IPR). Usually, the best way to protect an invention as it unfolds is to use a strategic combination of DPI.

Many inventors assume that the only way to protect your idea is patented. While patents tend to be of fundamental importance (see the patent process below), should take into account other forms of IPR. One or more may play an important role in protecting your idea.

Industrial Property Agents

Another key role it will play its industrial property agent. IPR is a complex area of law that hides many dangers for inexperienced inventors. The advice of an agent or patent attorney will be useful when planning an effective strategy for IP protection, and essential if you decide to patent your idea.

Patent lawyers :

Despite its name, patent attorneys are usually experts in all forms of IPR. They can increase your chances of getting a worthwhile protection for your idea and represent you when problems arise. Your patent attorney should be able to advise you fully on IP issues in their own country and throughout Europe. For IP issues outside Europe, most patent offices specialized in their country may represent, or arrange to represent him in any country.

However, it is important to note that no patent attorney can guarantee that your IP will produce economic benefits. The knowledge of a patent attorney is restricted to IP law. You or the team of other experts of its choice shall have the responsibility for the successful business of his invention.

When To Apply

Because of the formalism of the patent application process, the time you file the application can make a big difference in the pressures that will be submitted later. Is it better to apply for a patent early or late?

This question has no simple answer. Many investors are willing to apply for a patent as soon as possible, yet many successful companies delay the presentation until the products are almost ready for release.

Patent lawyers in india :

A drawback of application is that it soon may incur substantial costs without knowing even if the idea is commercially viable. Applicants have up to two years from the application before the patent fees earned them significant but this is rarely enough time to reach a licensing agreement with a company.

A disadvantage of filing late is that someone may have a similar idea before you.

For many inventors, the cost will be a key factor. The later you file, more delay costs. But how long can they hold out? long as you have all the information , your patent attorney should be able to identify an optimal time for filing the application, and advise you on steps you can take to protect your invention in the meantime.

A granted patent may help persuade investors that the idea deserves your support, and these resources could cover the cost of the patent. Accordingly, you should consider not only the patent as a means of protecting the idea, but also as a way to raise funds.
