One of the finest poets and the essayist ever born in the world of poetry was Alexander Pope. And one of the finest things that he ever wrote was the favorite essay better known to the world as "An essay on criticism". And one of the favorite stanzas that were written by this genius of a man are something like this "A little learning is dangerous thing, drink deep or taste not the Pierian Spring, their shallow draughts intoxicates our minds, and drinking largely sobers us again." And only one man understood the complete meaning of the stanza that Alexander born in the age when the poets were receiving patronage from the king of the England. And this man is Roger James Hamilton.

The best part of the learning that this man really did from the lines mentioned above is that neither he is the king who offers money or other gift to the best minds in the world of poetry, nor he is in any way possible involved in the academics or the world of art and culture. On the contrary Roger is completely involved in the field that is far far away from the enchanting world of prose and poetry and that too of the period of renaissance that continued right up till the Victorian age. Roger is a product of that ruthless enigma called the world of finance. And the world that he belonged to treated him exactly the way that it treats the other people who are built in the same mold as Roger James Hamilton is.

The more and more he trusted in the system that he was a part of the more and more he realized that system would not even think about people like him and ultimately would force him to lose millions and the precious enthusiasm filled years of his life. But the lines of Alexander Pope saved him as he realized that the people who were at the helm of the affairs governing the system of finance had just not tasted the pierian springs. All the philosophies and all the treatises that had been written to make sure that the system of finance would operate smoothly were based on the little learning that these so called mandarins had done. Roger James Hamilton dared to drink deep in the knowledge of wealth creation, and finally was able to taste the pierian springs that led him to the discovery of the true nature of wealth creation. And that true nature is to allow the flow of nature inside the human being that really struggles to come to the fore.

Roger James Hamilton in the form of his theories have really made sure that real knowledge of wealth creation is handed down to the deserving people and that too in the form that is apt.
