Three Myths About Family Law Wall, NJ by Aidan Margas

Article published on November 25th 2011 | Business

When it comes to family law and hiring a divorce attorney Wall, NJ, there are perhaps more misunderstood facts and myths floating around than in any other field of law for an attorney Wall, NJ. Itâ€™s a little odd that family law and divorce Wall, NJ is the area where you see the most misinformation out there, but then, perhaps it makes sense. Family law is more emotionally charged for those involved than, say, DUI attorney Wall, NJ cases. In any event, here are three of the most common myths about family law that just donâ€™t hold true.

The Courts Always Award Custody to the Mother

If this myth were true there would probably be no such thing as a divorce attorney Wall, NJ and they wouldnâ€™t bother having custody hearings and trials. It is true that there is a tendency in the courts to award custody to the mother, but itâ€™s certainly false to say that this always happens, or even happens in all but the most extreme cases. The courts award custody to the parent who seems to be, in the eyes of the court, the more capable provider and caretaker.

Child Support is Just a Way to Punish Divorced Dads

When children wind up with the father, the mother often winds up having to pay child support. Itâ€™s fair to levy accusations of bias at individuals within the court system, but the law itself doesnâ€™t say anything about siding with the man or the woman in any event. In a recent case, a woman who was awarded child support was found out to have been pulling a scam, and ordered by the courts to pay back every penny that she received from the â€œfatherâ€• over the years, so clearly, there are instances where the system is abused, but the fact that the woman was forced to pay the man who turned out not to be the boyâ€™s father back only serves to prove that the system is actually designed to prevent such things from happening, that this is not the norm, but an abuse of the system in the eyes of any attorney Wall, NJ.

Divorce Always Results in an Even Split

A lot of factors weigh into the division of money and assets after a divorce. The idea is that both parties will get their fair share. If a woman married a man who was already wealthy, she might not receive a full fifty percent, but might receive a share prorated for the time that the couple were married. If a stay at home husband helped a woman along as she climbed the ladder and earned a six figure salary, he might be entitled to a full fifty percent. It depends on a number of things, not least of which being the courtâ€™s discretion and, of course, how each attorney Wall, NJ argues their clientâ€™s case.

The main thing to understand about the family court system is that itâ€™s a lot more complex than it is often seen as being. There are a lot of shades of gray, as divorce and family are two very emotional, touchy and human subjects, and applying a system of rules to that is not so much a perfect fix as it is the best we can do.
