Some tribes refuse to have their photographs taken or even be filed as they believe that a camera steals a part of their soul with each and every photograph taken, if you tell this to art based photographers they would tend to agree with this term. These photographers would agree because in their opinion a photograph should capture the essence and soul of the subject as these are the photographs that stand out from critique.

There is however another form of photography that has the ability to capture the very essence of its subject area and that discipline is: timelapse photography. Timlapse photography is a very useful photography discipline and can be used to capture a wonderful array of subject matters.

This article is aimed at exploring some of the different subject areas that this style of photography can capture beautifully and effectively. The article will then conclude by informing you on where you can find more information on timelapse photography and time-lapse video.

Different subject matters

As mentioned previously timelapse photography can be used to capture an array of different events and occasions, before we talk about all of these different subject areas lets disscuss a brief synopsis of timelapse photography; it is where you keep a camera fixed in one position and systematically take pictures of the same subject over a period of time to show transition.

The time lapsed can varry depending on the subject matter, but the time difference can vary from minutes, hours, days, months etc. Some examples of the different subjects that benefit from timelapse photography include:

Macro life â€“ this can be plants and insects alike, it has the ability to capture a flower growing and blossoming. It also has the ability to capture a caterpillar turning into a butterfly.

Man made building and objects â€“ you can use timelapse photography to capture buildings being erected, for example you could capture an Olympic stadium being built or a skyscraper being erected.

As you can see there are many interesting subject matters that can be captured from using timelapse photography, as it has the ability to capture a moment in time.
