Tips for Clearing an Overgrown Garden by Jeffkinnelson

Article published on August 2nd 2012 | Business

If a homeowner has neglected to clean his garden for a long time or he has just bought a house with overgrown garden that is badly neglected, he can clear it out either with the help of chemicals or tools and they are at liberty to use any of these two methods. Here, the two methods of clearing overgrown garden are discussed:

Mechanical clearing: He can make use of either a scythe or a brushwood cutter or even a nylon line trimmer for clearing out the unwanted plants. Then, he can make use of rotary mower cut for clearing out any remaining growth as low as possible, but without disturbing the left over vegetation. The homeowner can also make use of rotavator for churning up the soil and for chopping up the weeds. He can use this equipment several times for breaking up the matted vegetation and then can rake up for removing it from the surface. Even after rotavating, there might be some pieces of roots of perennial weeds and they should also be carefully removed otherwise, they are capable of growing at a faster pace thereby causing hindrance to the actual vegetation. Therefore, once the process of rotavating is completed, it is necessary for the homeowner to rake over the plot for making sure that the roots of weeds are not left over.

Chemical clearing: When it comes to this type of cleaning, it is essential that the homeowner should carefully follow the instructions given by the manufacturer. Here, the chemical should be carefully sprayed with some form of weed killer and time should be given for the chemical to take effect and then the top-growth should be removed. Some vegetation might escape from the effect of weed killer and in such a way one more round of spraying might be used. Then, the dead vegetation should be removed or it can also be incorporated into the soil.

In the case of organic gardens, where chemicals cannot be used or when the layout of the plot does not allow of usage of weed killer evenly, the mechanical clearance or any other methods like organic and mulching practices can be used.

To relive themselves of all these stress of self-removal of unwanted plants from garden, home owners can get the help of firms, who are specialized in clearing overgrown garden. These firms send their staff, which is professionally trained for doing this job in such a way that the homeowners can find their garden fresh again without any stress or strain.
