Truckers are the lifeline of any transportation and logistical service providers. They cater to the need of the people who seek supply chain for their products. It involves transportation and distribution of commercial and industrial goods to the end users. A truck driver is a person who earns a living as the driver of commercial moving vehicles. Truckers provides an important service to every economy by carrying large consignments and loads of raw materials, semi-finished materials and finished goods over land, typically from manufacturing plants to the retail outlets. Let it be construction industry, mining industry and agro industry trucks are responsible to deliver the higher percentage of freight movement over land and is the core of manufacturing, construction and warehousing industry. Almost every product sold in United States of America at least it spends some time in truck; no other form of transportation has flexibility like trucks.

According to bureau of Labor statistics, USA, truck drivers holds 3.2 million jobs in 2008 which will increase by another 9% over 2008-2018 and percentage of heavy and tractor-trailer truck drivers will grow by 13% over 2008-2018 as a result of ever increasing demand for goods in US.

Though new technologies like power steering, Global positioning system etc. has been introduced still trucking jobs are physically demanding jobs. Driving for long hours, loading and unloading cargo and providing multiple deliveries could be tiring. So it is a major lifestyle choice to be made.
